This book is dystopian literature, meaning it is fictional and criticizes real life problems in an exaggerated manner. Our protagonist is Montag the fireman and one of the big antagonists is Beatty the captain of all the firemen. But in dystopian novels as well as all novels anything against the protagonist is their antagonist. There is also Mildred, Montag's wife and Clarisse Montag's friend. The main gist of the book is that firemen in this society burn books to prevent knowledge and how controlling higher authority can be.

I personally loved the book because it had the right amount of suspense and mystery. Also having Montag's story unravel really made me think of our own society that we live in. And since the book doesn't have chapters but is split into three parts there were no boundaries to stop me from reading further! We only had a few consistent characters throughout the book but Clarisse was my favorite, she was so innocent yet filled with so much knowledge. Even more than Montag ever realized. The book like I had said before really made me think about if there were any similarities between Montag's society and ours.

I highly, highly recommend this book (trust me it will be hard to put down). I recommend this book so highly because of the sense of mystery on who was behind everything and hope that Montag could be happy in the book. I honestly think anyone above 14 would enjoy this book, also people who love suspense, hope and books that touch on real life problems that could potentially happen with too much higher authority and not much knowledge. This book really reminds me of Animal Farm, another dystopian novel, which is also as good as this one.
